Inner Frame Vision

(a quiet manifesto)

Many things emerge from a path that has already been lived.

They become texts, stories, books, videos, films —

they take form, but do not lose their nature.

These are moments.

Vivid memories.

What has been lived — or what is unfolding right now.

They are alive.

And they continue to live,

even when they remain far away in memory.

There are fictional characters.

There are real people.

And there are those who are no longer here —

yet they still exist within the narratives, not as shadows, but as part of the structure.

The boundary between fiction and reality

ceases to be a line.

It becomes a space.

Creation in Inner Frame Vision is not a process of invention.

It is assembly.

States, thoughts, fragments, emotions —

begin to find one another, to connect,

to form a system

that existed long before it was consciously understood.

After the projects are released,

they begin to live their own lives.

They no longer fully belong to the author.

They move forward —

into perception, into memory, into the inner worlds of others.

And there, they continue.

It feels like magic.

Or something beyond it,

something that has yet to be defined.

Because at that moment, paths begin to intersect.

Thoughts, emotions, dreams, fantasies, reality — of completely different people

suddenly enter the same space.

Someone recognizes themselves.

Someone feels more deeply for the first time.

Someone simply remains within that state a little longer than they intended.

And in that — something essential happens.

Many pick up this energy.

Or sink into the feelings,

moving alongside the author —

not through the plot,

but through an inner state.

Toward silence.

Toward depth.

Toward that quiet mysticism

where art ceases to be form and becomes experience.

Inner Frame Vision

is not just creation.

It is the continuation of something that was once lived and refused to disappear.

The Hidden Manifesto
of
Inner Frame Vision

Contemporary culture no longer collapses because of the absence of images.

It collapses because of their excess.

The image has multiplied to such an extent that perception itself has become fragmented.

We scroll, we consume, we register impressions — but the image rarely becomes a space we can enter.

For centuries, narrative functioned as a line.

A sequence of events moving forward through time.

But the contemporary mind no longer inhabits time in this way.

We move through fragments, layers, interruptions, memory fields.

The linear structure of storytelling begins to feel artificial — almost mechanical.

What replaces the line is not chaos.

It is space.

Inner Frame Vision emerged from this shift.

Not as a stylistic choice, but as a structural response to a transformed perceptual condition.

In Inner Frame Vision, narrative does not unfold through events, but through spatial architecture.

Meaning is not delivered; it is encountered.

Each work becomes a room.

Each image becomes a threshold.

Each frame becomes a boundary between visible and invisible layers of the narrative field.

The viewer does not follow a story.

The viewer enters a structure.

The frame therefore ceases to function as a decorative border.

It becomes a conceptual instrument.

An inner frame is the point at which perception turns inward — where an image stops representing and begins containing.

Within such a structure, the work is never exhausted by viewing.

It remains open, like a room one may return to.

Inner Frame Vision is therefore neither a genre nor a visual style.

It is a method of constructing narrative space.

A quiet architecture in which images, texts, and cinematic fragments form an interior field of perception.

What appears as a frame is only the entrance.

II. Characters That Do Not Disappear

VISION

There are characters that end with the story.
And there are those who do not leave.

They are not ghosts.
And they are not simply memories.

Rather, they are a form of presence that does not need explanation.

They appear almost unnoticed —
in a gesture,
in the tone of a voice,
in the way silence is held.

At first, it feels controlled:
the author selects, assembles, shapes.

But at some point — almost imperceptibly — something shifts.

The character no longer follows the logic of the text.
They begin to exist alongside it.

Not separate,
and not entirely belonging to the author.

They simply... are.

And in that moment, another dimension emerges.

There is fiction.
There is memory.
There is the present.

And the characters move between them.

They can belong to the past — a fine line of memory that does not allow certain people to fade.

They can exist in the present —
shaping perception, influencing choices,
altering an inner rhythm.

And sometimes they seem to look ahead —
as if sensing the future,
turning it into images,
into scenes,
into states not yet lived.

In this sense, the text comes close to cinema.

It unfolds here and now,
yet leaves a trace —
a lingering aftertaste that does not end with the final line.

To reduce this to imagination is too simple.
To explain it as a psychological mechanism is not enough.

Because it is not about meaning.

It is about something that, once it appears,
continues to live.

III. Where Inner Worlds Meet

Every work begins in solitude.

A thought, an image, a feeling, or a memory takes form within a single mind. For a time, it belongs only to its creator.

Then it is shared.

Many believe that at this moment a work leaves its author and begins an independent life.

INNER FRAME VISION sees it differently.

A work never leaves its author.

It simply continues its existence among those for whom it was created and among those who find something meaningful within it.

The connection is not broken.

Years later, the author may discover new meanings within the same work, continue its growth, or simply contemplate it from another place in life.

The work remains open to both its creator and those who encounter it.

Through a work, one person is given the opportunity to glimpse the thoughts of its author.

Not to receive answers, but to experience a moment within another human consciousness.

This is why art matters.

Its deepest purpose is not the transfer of information.

It is the exchange of thoughts and feelings.

A work becomes a place where inner worlds meet.

Through a work, one person is given the opportunity to glimpse the author's thoughts.

The viewer brings thoughts and feelings of their own.

Neither replaces the other.

Together they create an encounter that could not exist otherwise.

Within INNER FRAME VISION, a work is not a departure.

It is a place of meeting.

A space where thoughts, feelings, memories, and experiences can be shared across distance and time.

IV. Beyond a Single Form

Inner Frame Vision is not limited to a single artistic form.

It exists in cinema,
photography,
literature,
poetry,
video-books,
sound,
performance,
and hybrid structures.

The system remains open to new forms
as they emerge.

The frame itself
may take many forms.

A classical museum frame.

A doorway.

A window.

A mirror.

A portal.

A line of light.

Fog.

Tree branches.

Architectural space...

Each frame becomes a point of entry.

A transition between worlds.

A passage
into the artistic space of the work.

Different forms reveal different dimensions of a unified artistic system.

For this reason,
Inner Frame Vision
cannot be defined
by a single medium,
a single structure,
or a single mode of perception.

It exists through a dialogue between forms,
between spaces,
and between ways of perception.

The frame remains open.

The possibilities remain open.

V. Memory as Structure

Memory is not preserved only in the past.

It continues to exist
through space,
through time,
through art,
and through human presence.

In Inner Frame Vision, memory is not nostalgia.

It is a structure.

It connects what has been,
what is,
and what continues to live
through perception.

Memory does not belong to a single moment.

It moves across generations,
places,
objects,
images,
sounds,
and stories,
revealing new meanings
each time it is encountered.

An object does not contain memory
by its own existence.

Memory is born from feeling.

It becomes an artistic space
where different times,
lives,
and meanings
continue to meet.

Every work preserves
more than an image.

It preserves
a presence.

And through that presence, memory continues
